

Automated External Defibrillators (AEDs) are machines with computers inside them that allow certified users to deliver a shock to a person in cardiac arrest in order to stop abnormal heart rhythms and restore normal heart rhythms. Tennessee State University was among the first Tennessee Board of Regent schools to provide multiple AED units on campus and currently has 38 of the machines overseen and maintained by the Department of Environmental Health and Safety. Training in the use of AED's and CPR is provided to faculty and staff periodically throughout the calendar year.
